Unfortunately, existing polyurethane foams are not easily made into the desired film shape and are generally known to have poor physical and chemical stability. In particular, the mechanical properties and solvent resistance of urethane foams are not good enough for use as packaging materials. These materials are considered to be undesirable because they are susceptible to degradation when contacted by food products and/or are problematic in manufacturing processes. In other words, it can be difficult to produce a flexible, occlusive foamed polymeric film without having delamination, cracking, or other physical or chemical problems in the final product. Therefore, there is a need in the art for the development of improved polyurethane compositions and films that exhibit good physical and chemical stability, while providing sufficient flexibility and occlusion to make the films useful in a variety of food-contact applications. It has now been discovered that certain polyols combined with isophorone diisocyanate (IPDI) result in compositions that are useful in forming polyurethane films having good mechanical stability. The compositions have a low viscosity and can be processed to form films that are extremely durable and can withstand repeated use and variations in temperature and humidity.Sydney man may be HIV positive to father-son incest relationship Eureka Street Updated The lawyer for the man accused of father-son incest has told the court he may be HIV positive, but his son's lawyer says he will say that the man has only a theoretical risk of contracting HIV via oral sex with his son.
